Uniform Tax Law Urged as the Best Remedy for the Evil.

claims the right to compel citizens to support the government even with his life. It would seem to be almost equally important that the government should have the right to compel its citizens to contribute to its support in the same way.

If anyone will look up the tax assessments of many wealthy Bostonians, he will find that they are not paying their share of the cost of the government.

question seems to me to be in the relation of our taxation laws to that they will be placed on some equitable and reasonable basis.

Our laws in Massachusetts today are neither equitable nor are the provisions of our constitution for the protection of our property.

What the Law Provides. On either theory it is of course clear that a citizen who dodges his taxes is clearly evading his responsibilities and obligations as a citizen and some method should be provided to compel him to pay from them.

Just the Same as Smuggling. There is not any reason, in my judgment, why such penalties should not be established and imposed for the evasion of taxation.

Another method which is more radical and revolutionary, but seems to me to be a better one, would be to provide a uniform tax law for the entire country.

HOW MR. WINSLOW SAVED $12,000 IN TAXES BY MOVING

BEVERLY, April 15.—After declaring himself a resident of Orleans on Cape Cod, instead of his city, Sidney W. Winslow, president of the Hallowell Manufacturing Company, will save about $12,000 a year in his personal property alone.

Opportunity Week! That is the name of the big announcement which the Contest Editor promised he would give today. Here is the announcement itself:

During the week beginning next Monday, April 22, and ending Saturday, April 29, at 10 p. m., all subscriptions will count double. A full-page announcement of this Opportunity Week will also be found in another part of this paper.

This extraordinary offer will not be repeated in the AMERICAN'S great $35,000 Contest. It is by far the biggest offer in the whole Contest. There will be no other like it.

One of the surest signs of eczema is itching, and the very first step toward curing it is to stop the itching by scratching means the trouble away.

Prison for Tax-Dodgers. Secondly, I would suggest as an additional and probably somewhat complete remedy for tax dodging, even under our present law, a suitable penalty by way of imprisonment.

Scope Limited at Present. We are not at all at liberty to discuss the question of a uniform tax law for the entire country.

It is my opinion that evasion of taxation cannot be controlled by taxation. The remedy must be on one which will meet with the approval of the public by making him feel that he is not bearing more than his proportionate share of the burden of government.

French Serges, Striped Worsteds and Mannish Cloths. Values so convincing and styles so fascinating that they are bound to excite wonder.

MEANEY IS TALKED FOR SECOND PLACE

Blackstone Legislator Boomed for Lieutenant-Governor by Democratic Leaders.

A boom for Representative John F. $40 to $75 Imported French Hats 25.00

There must be a reason and a powerful one to cause such radical price concessions at the very dawn of the season. The reason is this: We paid from $40.00 to $75.00 for these hats in Paris a month ago—paid an import duty beside. We bought them as pattern hats and for exhibition purposes. They've served their duty—therefore you can have your choice of the remaining ones.

Nothing Counts Like Service

REPEAT ORDERS—WHAT THEY MEAN

An overwhelming majority of Thomas owners, a few of whom we mention, have purchased two or more cars, showing their recognition of complete superiority and appreciation of service rendered. Is not their confidence and experience a safe guide in selecting a car for your own or family's use?

We Reiterate—This is the third year for the long-stroke, large-valve, six-cylinder Thomas, and to our knowledge no one car of this type has been offered for sale by a New England owner. TRY TO BUY ONE.

TRUE MOTORING ENJOYMENT DEPENDS UPON SEVERAL ESSENTIALS—ALL OF WHICH ARE FOUND IN THE VARIOUS 1931 BUICK MODELS

COMFORT—Without which other motor car virtues are valueless—was the first and last thought of the Buick designers in planning the new models.

RELIABILITY—There would not be more Buick cars registered in Massachusetts than any other make if satisfied owners were not thoroughly satisfied for that important feature.

DURABILITY—The number of Buick cars now in use throughout the United States that have traveled in excess of 75,000 miles each is sufficient proof that they are not lacking in this respect.

ABILITY—Power (who will doubt Buick power?), Flexibility (the natural result of ample power and speed).

APPEARANCE—Any one of the 1931 Buick Models is the equal in the matter of finish and detail of any car selling at a much higher price.

PRESIDENT PENS "WORK IN BOSTON"

A Great Missionary Meeting
Showing Marvelous Work Begins Saturday.

President Taft will present the button campaign of Christian workers here during the week-end which will have its climax at 2 o'clock next Saturday afternoon. That the "World in Boston," greatest missionary show ever attempted on this side of the Atlantic, will draw open its doors at the Mechanics Building.

What a tremendous effort. Before the first twenty-five cents subscription to pay the sum of $100,000 will have been paid out preparing for this splendid exhibition. Every day to date has been paid and enough money is in hand to defray the last penny of expense. It is in honor to the belief of the Evangelical churches of New England in their mission to the world at home and in the far East.

But the expenditure of this enormous sum of money alone would have little meaning were it not for the spirit of sacrifice shown by nearly eighteen months now every penny of money of this kind to make the great thing and motion picture of modern mission triumphantly productive and successful.

Notable Sponsors.
The Mechanics Building, Madison Square Garden, has housed some notable displays of the handicrafts of men, some religious spectacles. Neither has ever produced anything comparable with this tremendous and practical display for education to the masses. It is a great thing to be seen in the world round by men and women unconnected in the world.

With a sum like the $100,000, the Board of Christian Missions, as president, the success of the exhibition is not in doubt. He has not doubted after the first few weeks. The success of the exhibition is not in doubt. He has not doubted after the first few weeks.

TALK about a swift town. The chief of police in Chicago sent a dozen photographs of a notorious criminal who was wanted in that city to the various police departments throughout the country for distribution among the detectives to assist in his identification in case he should be apprehended. Next day a telegram came from the chief of police at Philadelphia, saying:

"Your six photographs received. We have succeeded in arresting four of the criminals and expect to get the other two by tonight."

"Your six photographs received. We have succeeded in arresting four of the criminals and expect to get the other two by tonight."

"At the second landing his wife's sister met him and said:

"Congratulations! You are the father of two fine bouncing boys."

"Congratulations! You are the father of three fine bouncing boys."

"Thank heaven I don't live on the top floor."

WHEN I was born my said I was a peach. Pa said he was glad I wasn't a pear.

FLIM--Say, Flim, why don't you stop drinking? Flim--What for?

Flim--Just look at the money you will save. I stopped drinking for a year and saved enough money to buy my wife a sealskin coat.

Flim--Yes, and I stopped drinking once for three weeks and saved enough money to pay for a first-class funeral, and if I had sworn off for three weeks longer I would have needed the funeral.

"COHN is suing his wife for a divorce."

"You don't say so? On what grounds?"

"Why, she went into the second hand clothing house and put an advertisement in the paper which read:

"Mrs. Cohn has cast off clothing of every description and invites an early inspection."

BROWN'S cheerfulness was a source of wonder and admiration to his friends. He invariably accepted everything as a wise dispensation. But, then, he had large share of the world's goods, his friend said, and nothing but adversity would shake him. Therefore, when a promising crop was washed away by the neighbors were astonished to hear him say:

"It's all for the best, I had more than my usual year."

In the winter his house burned down. To neighbors' solicitations he calmly replied:

"The house never suited me anyway; it's all the best."

The climax came when he was in a railroad accident and both of his feet were cut off.

"You are pretty well discouraged now, ain't you with both feet off?" asked a friend who saw him in hospital. "Do you think this is all for the best?"

Brown nodded his head and said: "Yes, they were always cold, anyway."

MY wife is awfully considerate of me. My hair is getting very thin on top last winter and she bought me a bottle of the greatest hair restorer I ever saw. She rubbed it on my head every night and in six months I had a beautiful new head of hair--and then she pulled it all out again.

WOMAN expects more for her money than man. I was in a five-and-ten-cent store one day when a woman came in and said to the clerk:

"Give me one of those five-cent mouse traps, and hurry up, please, I want to catch a train."

I SPENT two dollars to have a doctor prescribe for me for a pain in my back, and now I don't know whether I have been uncooperated or not. The doctor gave me some pills, and the directions read:

"Take one pill a half hour before you feel the pain coming on."

I T sure does take the Irish to beat the Dutch. Reilly and Schultz came over in the storage together and all the way across they fought. The weather was very rough and poor Reilly was a bad sailor, while Schultz stood up while the ship pitched its worst. He took real delight in taunting Reilly, who was too ill to retaliate, but Reilly bided his time and swore he would get even.

He did.

Three weeks after they landed in this country Reilly arrested Schultz for keeping open on Sunday.

A CONDUCTOR on a sixth avenue car passed a bad half dollar on me one day last week and I didn't find it out until I had left the car. I was wondering what to do with it when I noticed a man standing in the corner with a sign "I am blind" around his neck and a dog holding a tin cup in its mouth by his side. I dropped the bad half dollar into the cup and the blind man said:

"Here, I don't want that! It's no good."

"What the dickens," I asked, in surprise, "ain't you blind?"

"No, I'm begging for the dog," he answered.

I USED to work for the moonshiner man that ever lived. He could figure closer and economize better than all the combined financial interests that go to make up our trusts and banking institutions. His mind had been wandering with fever for three weeks, and when he came back to his senses and opened his eyes and saw a strange woman with a white cap on bending over him, he gasped:

"I am the trained nurse," was the reply.

"The trained nurse! Oh, good gracious! And how much am I paying you?"

She told him, and he closed his eyes and groaned.

A few minutes later he said:

"But I am back in my right mind now, ain't I?"

"Yes, I think you are."

"All right, then. I give you notice to leave to-morrow."

Grin's Modern Fairy Tales Little Red Riding Hood

ONCE upon a time there lived a charming little girl of no more than twenty-two Summers. Her home was with her Ma-ma at the time this story begins, for she had just returned from a foreign country called Re-no, and had brought a most interesting paper back with her, which bore her name and that of a fortunate man who does not enter into this narrative, all being signed in the flowing but hasty hand of an over-worked Judge.

On this particular bright, sunshiny morning Little Red Riding Hood was putting on the hood that gave her her name. Her Ma-ma, although living in a country village, was a wise woman, and dressed her little girl in garments befitting a girl of sixteen, which made every one stare, and some of the men (only those who saw her) sigh.

Her dear Grandmother lived two miles back in the country on a timber tract of some 800 acres, which Little Red Riding Hood and her dear Ma-ma hoped some day to convert into long green fields that would burn with a more cheerful, crackling blaze than the crude cord wood.

And, as there were other relatives, Ma-ma and Little Red Riding Hood were very kind to dear old Grandmother. Only that morning dear Mama sighed and said: "I do wish your Grandmother would get well—or something!" Which shows their tender regard for her.

Little Red Riding Hood was taking a quart of food to her Grandmother, and trudged daintily along the country road, lifting her short skirts out of the dew. Her stockings, which matched her hood, showed at the ankles and twinkled merrily in the sunlight. Just then, as she entered a dismal part of the country road, she was overtaken by an automobile in which sat an old but very much interested man.

"Where are you going, may I ask?" he inquired.

"You may ask, seeing you have already done so," replied Little Red Riding Hood, politely. "I am going to my dear Grandmother's, and it is a long, tiresome walk," and she looked longingly at the comfortable red morocco seat in the tonneau beside the Old Gentleman and thought how it matched her hood and so forth.

"Hop right in, my little angel face," said the Kind Old Gentleman, and he moved over nearer the middle of the seat that she might be wedged in tighter and thus not rattle around, which was so kind and thoughtful of him.

The Kind Old Gentleman took her to her Grandmother's and waited outside for her.

"Did you ride over here with that wicked old Geese?" asked Little Red Riding Hood's dear Grandmother, peering out of the window and then pouring out a portion of the quart of food for her.

"I did, dear Grandmother, and now don't get spiffed," warned Little Red Riding Hood with tenderness, noticing that her Grandmother had taken a water glass full of the nourishment.

"But he's an old Wolf, a veritable Wolf, looking out for his own," warned the Grandmother, pouring out some more of the food, "ask your mother, if you do not believe me."

It was a good idea, for Little Red Riding Hood knew her mother was a Wise Ma-ma. Being an up-to-date farming district, there was a telephone in every home, so she called her Ma-ma up and asked her about him.

"He may be a Wolf, child, but he has no teeth. On the other hand, he has seventeen millions and a weak heart," exclaimed the fond Ma-ma. "I didn't know he was back from Europe. They said he was coming home to die."

"I'm on, dear Ma-ma," said L. R. R. H. "If I'm not home until late, do not worry," and she hung up the receiver.

Bidding a fond adieu to her dear old Grandmother, Little Red Riding Hood emerged from the house and climbed carelessly, yet gracefully, into the tonneau. The effect was something like a Venetian sunset, and the Kind Old Gentleman's weak heart nearly stopped work then and there.

In innocent and childish prattle she talked of the birds and flowers and of her lonesome life, and asked him, wonderingly, with round, staring eyes, if he had no one to care for him, until the Kind Old Gentleman's poor heart was all of a flutter.

Out of the kindness of his weak heart he asked her to come home with him, but Little Red Riding Hood sighed and told him she would have to ask her Ma-ma.

"Unless," she said, timidly, pressing the Kind Old Gentleman's hand, "unless we run away right now and get married. What a splendid joke on Ma-ma!"

The Kind Old Gentleman looked into her innocent eyes and realized what a brute he had been to forget to suggest that, so they rode up to the Town Clerk, who was also the Village Cobbler and Notary Public and Justice of the Peace, and secured a marriage license and were married.

It was indeed a great joke on Ma-ma. She nearly went into convulsions when she heard the news, but she moved right into the Kind Old Gentleman's great mansion on the hill.

Having such a weak heart, the Kind Old Gentleman, alas, lived only a week. After the funeral, as Little Red Riding Hood and her Ma-ma climbed into the great red automobile for a little spin, Little Red Riding Hood remarked, "Isn't it so fortunate, dear Ma-ma, this red automobile just matches my red riding hood?"

"Ah, my dear," sighed her Ma-ma, "there certainly is class to you."

And they lived happily ever after.

The Girl in the Detention Pen By Bertram Lebharr

A Pathetic Story of a Long-Delayed Letter and a Trusting Immigrant Girl Who Failed to Find Her Lover Waiting for Her—A Real Life Incident of Interest in Boston, Where So Many Immigrants Land.

A FINE imported touring car, richly upholstered in maroon leather and with silver initials on its glossy side doors, drew up in front of the Burgo Office. Two fashionably dressed women, one past middle age, the other young and very beautiful, alighted and joined the shabby, foreign-looking through which was stepping aside the government leader.

The crowd, which consisted mostly of shaven women and bearded men, glanced curiously at the newcomers, wondering what business such great ladies could have to transact with the immigration authorities. Surely, they thought, they could not be, like themselves, going to meet relatives "from the other side."

The younger of the two women looked decidedly bored. As the boat moved swiftly across the harbor toward Ellis Island she turned to her companion, her heavy chin up, and her gaze steadily fastened on the tall and thin Liberty statue, taking no notice of the people around her.

Her companion, however, was studying her fellow-passengers on the tender with interest.

"These are Americans in the making," she whispered. "It is quite evident from their appearance that they themselves have not long been in this country. Now they are going to welcome their relatives to the great land of opportunity. Isn't it an interesting spectacle, Edna?"

The younger woman nodded. "Yes, mother, I suppose they are interesting enough to look at, but—she sniffed disdaintly as the breeze wafted the oppressive odor of garlic to her delicate nostrils—"Really this is decidedly unpleasant. They ought to provide special boats for visitors of our social standing. It is intolerable that we should have to rub shoulders with—these class of people."

Her mother laughed softly.

"What a little snob you are, Edna! These boats belong to the Federal service, you know, and the United States government cannot afford to make class distinctions. And anyway, I am surprised to hear you express such prejudices. Are you for getting that your niece, Count di Torrenzo, is a foreigner?"

The haughty young beauty flushed crimson. "Don't be absurd, mother. I have no prejudice against foreigners of his class—but these people!—I am beginning to feel sorry that I allowed you to persuade me to accompany you on this amusing expedition. I am sure we are in for a most disagreeable time."

Her mother smiled, deprecatingly. "One cannot study poetry from a distance, you know. One must talk with the people. I think you will be entertained, my dear, by what you witness on the island."

and she had been sweethearts since childhood.

But on her eighteenth birthday they had quarreled and she had told him that she wished never to see him again. After long agonies she had bitterly regretted that display of temper—for the cause of their quarrel was really very trifling—but it was too late then. He sailed for the United States that very day without even bidding her farewell, and for twelve years she had not heard a word from him.

However, during all that time she had kept on loving him and praying to the Holy Mother to bring him back to her. For his sake she had refused several other offers of marriage—for in her youth she had many suitors.

And now, after these years of silence, she had received this letter from him telling her that he loved her more than ever and beseeching her to come to him.

He had learned the barbering trade—the better side—and now had a good job in a Broadway "tonorial parlor" and could afford to support a wife. It should come to New York he would do his best to make her happy.

And now they wanted to tell her that he was not to be found! What could it mean? She asked them, pitifully. Surely he would not have sent her that letter unless he had meant what he had written.

Mrs. Burton-Brown turned inquiringly to the commissioner.

"What do you suppose has become of the man?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "Who can tell? Maybe after sending her that letter he changed his mind and has decided to keep away from her. We have had cases like that, you know—men falling in love with other girls here after they had written to their sweethearts in the old country to come here and be their wives."

"On the other hand, it is quite possible, of course, that the fellow has met or married another girl here and is living in some hole in New York."

"Antonio!" she screamed wildly, and fell fainting against the leather upholstery of the car.

"Whatever the reason, we cannot find him, and therefore she must go back to Italy."

"It seems a pity," declared Mrs. Burton-Brown, sympathetically. "Probably if an exhaustive search were made her young man might be located in time."

"Yes, perhaps—if enough time were taken—but unfortunately the government cannot wait that long."

Mrs. Burton-Brown turned impulsively to for all those years the poor creature has been eating her heart out in pitiful ignorance of the existence of that letter."

This conversation between mother and daughter had been conducted in English. The former now turned to the Italian girl and in her own language acquainted her with the discovery which they had made.

The unfortunate young woman's despair was terrible to behold. "Alas!" she cried, wringing her hands, "my Antonio is lost to me forever!"

"Don't give up hope yet, my dear," said her benefactress, soothingly. "Although such a long time has elapsed, it may still be possible for us to find him for you."

As the automobile drew up in front of a fine, brownstone residence on Riverside Drive, a tall, handsome, foreign-looking gentleman, who was just about to ascend the stoop, stopped eagerly to the curb to assist them to alight.

It was the Count di Torrenzo, Edna's fiancé. Hat in hand and bowing with the grace of a cavalier, he offered his arm first to Mrs. Burton-Brown, and helped her to the sidewalk.

Then he turned to Edna, and as he held her soft little hand in his white she jumped lightly from the vehicle, he whispered in her ear:

"Have you told them yet, dearest?"

"Not yet," she answered. "I haven't had the courage."

The Count smiled as he relinquished her hand and turned to assist the third occupant of the touring car.

Beatrice Devanno was standing in the tonneau, looking at him with an expression of purified astonishment in her great, dark eyes.

Suddenly she uttered a piercing cry: "Antonio!" she screamed wildly, and fell fainting against the leather upholstery of the car.

Mrs. Burton-Brown and her daughter, staring at him in incredulous amazement, saw that he had turned deathly pale and heard him exclaim:

"Good heavens! Beatrice!"

"Do you know this young woman?" demanded Mrs. Burton-Brown, sternly.

"I used to, years ago, madame," he answered, hoarsely.

"Then you are Antonio Doretto—formerly a barber—and not really the Count di Torrenzo?" gasped Edna, with a shudder.

His only reply was a self-deprecating shrug of the shoulders.

A little later, as they sat in a reception room listening to his cool recital of how he, a poor Italian barber, after winning a few thousand dollars in a lottery, had decided to pose as a foreign nobleman, and Mrs. Burton-Brown spoke, sternly: "And I suppose you will now marry this poor girl?" She placed her hand protectively, and spoke, upon the shoulder of Beatrice Devanno.

"Ah! But no, madame," he answered. "That is not out of the question. You see I no longer love her. Ten years ago I wrote to her asking her to be my wife, and she never answered my letter. Consequently, I try hard to take from out of my heart my love for her—and I succeed very well."

And, besides, madame," he went on, with a sardonic smile, "yesterday afternoon your daughter Edna and I decided that we will do something very romantic. So we went over to Jersey and were secretly married."

The Easter Bonnet

WHEN a woman buys a bonnet with a sunken garden on it, and her husband says "dog-gone it, that's the seventh hat this year," she assumes an air quite tragic and proceeds to work the magic of extracting reams of money from a tight-wad fiancé.

Then the man whose tone was brutal finds his logic vain and futile, and he tells her what he'll do till she begins to work her art for it makes him faint and dizzy when she gets extremely busy, and he reaches for his check book and with fifty bucks he parts.

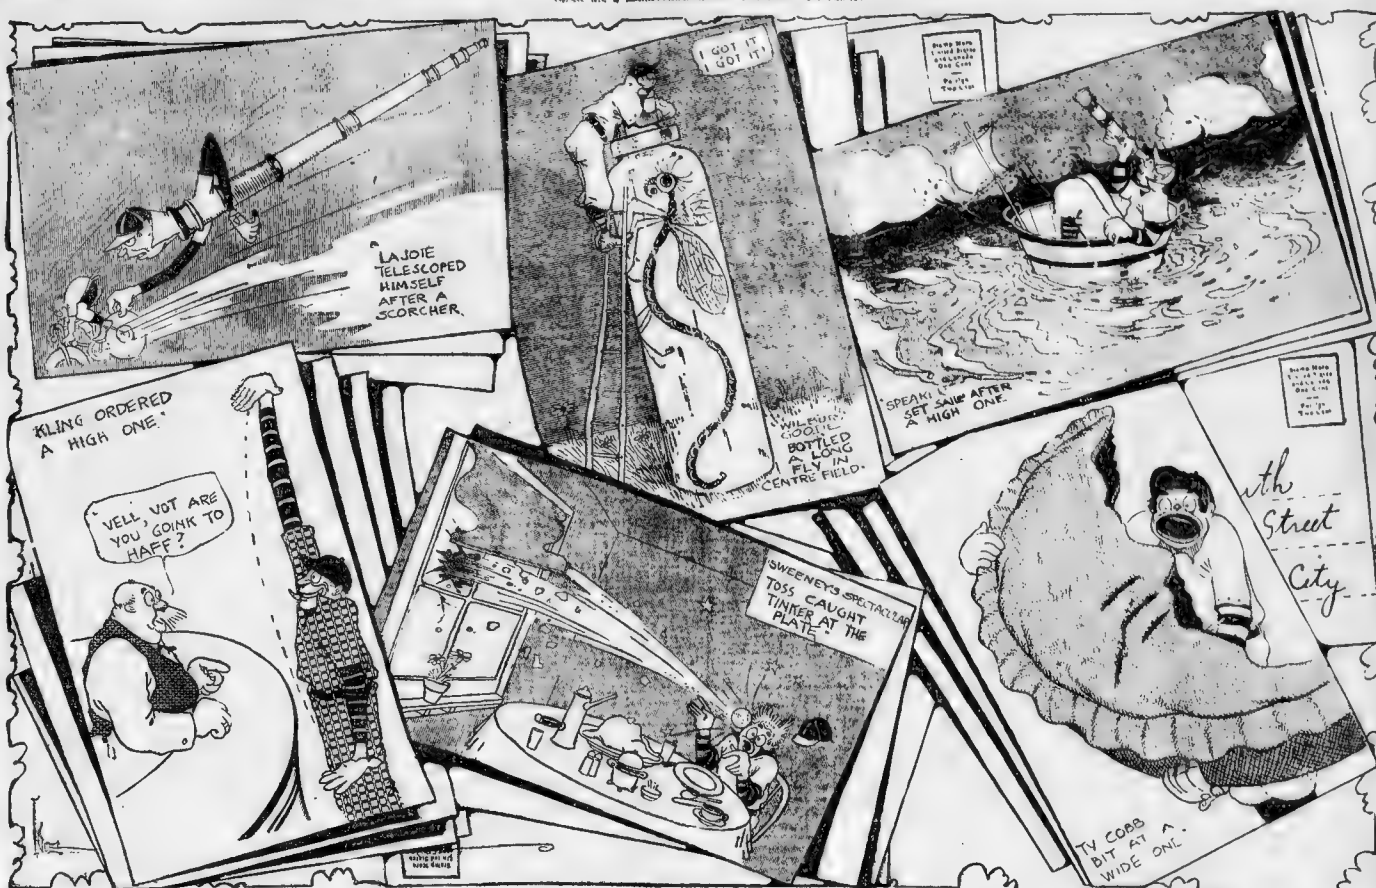

Then she prances to the salon of Magill-Cuddy Mallon, who spouts French words by the gallon, and picks out another hat. Then the scene is re-enacted and poor hubby is distracted, for his bank roll grows anemic while Miss Mallon's roll grows fat.

Oh, the lovely Easter bonnet! It's a poem, it's a sonnet, and the money that's spent on it swells the bank reserve, I'm sure. So, I'm glad I'm sane and sane, for I've come to burn and jingle, while the Bangle of the Bonnets keeps my married friends so poor.

A MAN was arrested for ordering a dinner at the Touraine on a $2.50 bank roll.

Serves him right. When a man orders dinner at the Touraine he should at least have money enough to tip the waiter.

THE New York police are still conducting a most spectacular raid on gambling houses, but leaving the thieves severely alone. The theatrical manner in which they are doing somersaults through skylights, ground and lofty tumbling on fire escapes, through doors, windows and chimneys, causes one to think that the police department is not working for the safeguarding of the city, but for the moving picture trust.

JUDGE GIEGRICH has decided that Mr. Nat C. Goodwin cannot marry again in New York State.

Much sympathy is expressed for Mr. Goodwin in thus having his matrimonial territory curtailed. But still there are forty-eight other States left for him to get married in. And when he does get married again it will be a matter of indifference to him what State it happens in.

He is accustomed to having his matrimonial affairs in a horrible state.

A MAN advertised in the papers for a wife who will be kind, gentle, young, pretty, a good cook and a good housekeeper, who will make him happy and run his house within the limit of his income. He makes eighteen dollars a week.

He doesn't want a wife. He wants an angel!

A NEW YORK banker catches burglar in his house and punishes him. We can understand the banker's indignation.

Professional courtesy should have made the banker home exempt.

LUTHER B. BRANK is experimenting upon a scientifically raised baby. It is claimed that the lunatic method will result in an ideal President of the United States.

Perhaps. But we do not feel that a man like Mr. Brank, who has made his reputation by "braining," should be entrusted with the cultivation of any future presidential possibilities. We will always have enough grafters in public life without having them brought up by an expert in the service.

A WOMAN in a harlem skirt trying to board a train was badly injured. "United we stand, divided we fall."

BERNARD SHAW claims that a child should be permitted to leave the school room any time that the teacher hovers him.

School children everywhere will unanimously endorse the Shawian idea.

With schools conducted on this principle pupils will make much more rapid progress than before, as there will be no possibility of failure in examination. When teacher, on examination day, puts a hard question up to Susie, all Susie will have to do will be to put on her hat, walk majestically to the door and say:

"Teacher, you have me," and walk, laughing.

But we opine that if the younger generation are taught to walk out of any place where they are bored, it would rather hard on Mr. Shaw when his plays are produced.

MR. EDWIN CLAYTON CLATHORP is a man who lives in fairness, and advises his friends to do the same.

to be young to share that belief. He says that if he had his way "very man and woman should be made to go into the parks every day to look for fairies."

Acting upon this advice, a young man went into the park the other day looking for a fairy and he found her, but she had her husband with her.

MAYOR of Huntington, Ind., arrested a citizen because the latter invited him to have a drink.

Moral: He regarded how you "treat" a Mayor. We wonder if the charges are "sedition."

IN Carl Morris we have at last a real white man. There is no chance of his ever being defeated, as long as he continues using such excellent discretion in the choice of his opponents.

A FARMER'S German military expert declares that the United States has no army, and in case of attack would be absolutely defenseless.

But judging from our past experience in war, for a nation that is defenseless and without an army was certainly do not away with it.

BEST STORIES TOLD LAST WEEK IN BOSTON

She Knew Hubby

A Beachmont man-amused four companions and a score of other listeners with this one.

MY wife told me a pretty good one the other day. It seems that a young married couple had settled down in our neighborhood, and, following the picking up of an acquaintance, the bride took some pride in showing my wife about her apartments.

"I like your home very much indeed," was my wife's comment, "but I do think you should have a spare room."

"You wouldn't think so if you knew John," was the reply. "His mother warned me about him just before we were married. If I had a spare room here John would be certain to bring home a spare guest every night."

Polite Criticism

By a Boston constable, who said in relating this: "Be a good fellow and don't mention my name."

MIDDLESEX and Suffolk County jurors are regarded as intelligent men, but I know of a case that transpired a short time ago, where the foreman, at least, looked upon one of his companions as not only lacking in intelligence, but showing obstinacy as well.

A jury had been out a very long time discussing a case. When the usual hour arrived one of the court officers entered the jury room with the query:

"Shall I order the usual twelve dinners, gentlemen?"

"No," answered the foreman, looking intently at one of his colleagues. "Make it eleven dinners and a bale of hay."

Trading Stamps

By the Traveling Salesman.

In competition in the life of trade, I guess Boston is a "boom town" all right. The rivalry is something terrible here in some lines of business—sharp as the blades of a safety. I show you a sample:

I was talking with a friend of mine the other day. He's the owner of a moving picture show in Washington street.

"How's business?" I asked.

"It ought to be rushing, but it ain't," he replied.

I inquired the reason. He said he had too many rivals in the biz.

"But I'll tell you what I'll do," he added. "Beginning Monday, I'm going to give trading stamps for every ten-cent adult admission."

True Economy

Told by a Roxbury physician in the guard room of Station 9 on Dudley street.

IHAVE to laugh now when I think of a case that I recently had. For it shows just how economical some women folks can be. I was summoned to a house located near my office and found upon my arrival that a woman had taken some nitrate of silver by mistake.

I ordered that copious drinks made up of the whites of eggs be administered. Upon hearing this the woman, though in much pain, turned to her daughter, who was already breaking the shells, murmuring the admonition:

"Katie, be sure you save those yolks for puddings!"

His Payment

By Samuel Landry, who is away up in the Order of Moose.

THIS justice of the peace had tried to knot and was waiting for the bride. The bridegroom fumbled about in his pants, looked within the pockets of his coat, while the witnesses members of the justice's own household, got out of the way so as not to embarrass him in that hunt.

"My George," he finally ejaculated, "I came away and left my money in my other clothes. I'll square it, though," he continued.

Then, drawing the justice to one side, he whispered:

"Take me down into the cellar and I'll fix things right with you. I'm a plumber and I'll show you how to 'twig' a meter so that it won't register more than twenty per cent."

Strict Propriety

A story related at a meeting of Newton Clubwomen during the week.

ALITTLE Newtonville girl of three was all ready for slumberland and occupied the nursery alone, when her brother Bobbie came to the door and sought to enter.

"Let me in, sister," he shouted, all the while rattling the knob.

"You can't get in," was the reply.

"Mama says little boys mustn't see little girls in their nightgowns. I'm in my nightgown now."

Silence followed on both sides of the door.

Then the little girl's voice broke the stillness.

"You can come in now, Bobbie. I've tucked it off," she called, and her mother's prompt arrival saved the situation.

"The old-time fallacies must go! Man's tyranny must stop!
To lean on man is but to cling to an uncertain prop!
Let us demand equality!"—Then suddenly the throng

"Winnie!" he cried, "come out of that!"—He grasped her by the arm,
While half a hundred Suffragettes raised voices of alarm.
"Unhand that lady!" they exclaimed. Said Philip, "Come with me!"
You'll be arrested, sir!" they cried. Said Philip, "Well, we'll see!"

Then through that surging, threatening crowd he marched with Winnie Wynne.
He pushed her quite ungently, such a temper he was in.
He said, "I am ashamed of you! It's a positive disgrace
To make those Suffrage speeches in such a public place!"

"Now, Philip," Winnie smiling said, "don't get so hopping mad;
You see, I simply couldn't resist the chance I had.
But—well—I WAS a little scared—and I'm so glad you're here!"
She squeezed his arm and SMILED at him, and Philip murmured, "Dear!"

The Man Who Hoped was walking one day along the street;
His thoughts were all of Winnie Wynne, and all his thoughts were sweet.
He heard a great commotion, and noticed as he passed
A girl haranguing from a cart; a crowd was gathering fast.

He could not see the speaker, but he heard her high, clear voice.
"That we are making progress, my sisters, we rejoice!
We strive but for our lawful rights; we seek our lawful place;
Let us attain our noble aims! Be equals in the race!"

You Know What You Think Of A Monkey But Do You Know What A Monkey Thinks Of You?

A Man Is Really Measured, Not by What He Thinks of Himself, but by What Others Think of Him. He Cannot Afford to Ignore the Opinions of Others!

Copyright, 1911, by the Sunday American-Journal-Examiner.

I know very definitely what we think about monkeys. Scientists have studied them, circus and amusement men have captured and exhibited them, faunal naturalists have shot them —despite the fact that shooting a monkey seems brutally akin to shooting a child.

We have classified monkeys into many families, separated from the rest of the apes from which it is believed the human species descended, and done our best to reduce to some form or system the incoherent, meaningless chatter with which they cry to one another as they swing from the tree tops.

As a result, we believe we know that monkeys will be monkeys always; that, while some few members of some few of the higher species can be taught marvelous tricks, the ordinary monkey brain will never develop beyond its present state; in other words, that monkeys will always be foolish, half-idiotic creatures, doing with the utmost seeming gravity the most absurd things, and, no matter how carefully trained, just stopping short of that impassable barrier between instinct and reason.

It would be interesting to know what the monkey, peering down on a party of sailors from the top of a coconut tree, or lowering gloomily at an audience from behind the bars of a circus cage, thinks of human beings.

It may be that he regards them servilely, as does a dog, who is always eager to acknowledge man as his master. It may be that he regards them with the haughty contempt so evident in all the feline tribes, from the lion down to the ordinary house cat. Monkeys are sometimes affectionate, but their affection seems always to be tempered with a rankish wariness very like that of a half-witted child.

In any event, it is not likely that any of the funny, furry, long-tailed apes that look on man from the jungle have half as high an opinion of him as he has of himself. It would be reasonable to suppose that they look on him as a sort of walking joke; one that must not be approached too closely; a feeble creature, ridiculous because he lacks a tail, not to be suffered too much familiarity because he carries death in his hands, yet withal much less dangerous than a lion or a tiger.

In the curious half solemn, half ridiculous procession from birth to death that we call life are many sets and tribes and races of men, many cliques and companies, each bound together by some slender tie of blood or education or association, each looking on the members of other cliques or companies as strangers and of a strange race—as alien as the monkeys of the jungle.

Every man knows what he thinks of himself; he fancies that he knows what others think of him. But never, by a merciful provision, is he permitted really to KNOW what others think of him.

And each company of men, set apart from the others by reason of some bond of calling, is regarded by those of other occupations as of a peculiar nature, not to be regarded as men, but as plumbers, or doctors, or hotel clerks, or actors—all supposed to be of one kind of nature, and entirely different from the rest of the world.

You will hear a man account for some peculiarity in a fellow man by saying: "Oh, he is an actor. That is the reason he is improvident or temperamental." Yet among actors are those who are so little improvident that they retain as a keepsake the first dollar they ever earned, and others who are so little temperamental that they can look unmoved on scenes that would upset the equilibrium of an undertaker.

It may be that all men are not brothers, but assuredly all classes of men are human. You will find the same types in a meeting of wholesale grocers as you will in a society for ethical culture. It is only the inability of one collection to understand another collection or to see in them the characteristics that are prominent in their own kind that makes life seem like such a complicated affair, and the solution of its simplest problems seem so difficult.

There are men in this country who, because they have succeeded in piling up more dollars than other men, calmly assume that they are of a superior sort, and undertake to settle for their brothers all the difficulties that have arisen to confound them.

One man decides that the need of his brothers is books; and he gives them books—books that will lie for generations corded high on dusty shelves, while the crowd rushes past outside the door and never looks between two covers.

He knows what he thinks of the other men in the world; but he has not the slightest idea what they think of him. Thus far he has never been disturbed by a frank expression of opinion, and he will probably pass along on his way into another existence sublimely confident that he of all men has understood his fellows, and given them what was good for them.

Yet there are multitudes of people who would rather have one kind word of encouragement or advice from a truly successful man than whole libraries of books from the richest man who ever gave them out as souvenirs of his own good fortune, and who have more esteem for the man who has taught them how to help themselves than for all the self-constituted philanthropists in the world.

For philanthropy is not a question of money; it is a matter of understanding one's fellow men, and few there be who are born with this rarest of talents.

Another man conceives it to be his duty to equip missionary establishments in foreign lands, forgetting that there is more real need of missionary work in every great city than there is in all the islands of the South Seas or all the barbaric countries of the Old World.

His opinion of his fellow men—of those whom he sees, with whom he deals, and whom he employs—is fixed; he would not and could not change it. Their opinion of him is something of which he knows and cares nothing. Perhaps he would do more with the incredible fortune he has accumulated if he tried to get a little more knowledge of the men about him. But he has never considered that worth his while.

Perhaps you have seen a man talking loudly and importantly to a company of other men—dwelling on his own performances and accomplishments, impatient of interruption, insistent on monopolizing the whole conversation. It would be a rude shock to his vanity if he knew that the men around him were either amused or bored by his egotism, and that the impression he is creating is exactly the reverse of what he intends.

You see every day women decked out in useless and unnecessary finery, in a wealth of decoration that none save the Queen of a cannibal island ought really to envy, and fancying that, because she has loaded down her natural attractions with a vulgar display, she has enhanced them. She makes a pathetic spectacle, and the most pathetic thing about it is her belief that the pitying glances that are bestowed on her are glances of admiration.

If you could know the sacrifices and the struggles that girls who barely earn enough to keep alive must make in order to buy shoes that pinch their feet, corsets that distort their waists, and great unwholesome hanks of Chinese hair, you might better understand what a price must be paid because people cannot see themselves as others see them. The young women who invest what little they can spare in these atrocities of dress do so in the pathetic belief that they are making themselves beautiful. They cannot see with the eyes of others, so they can never know that they are only making themselves hideous, even in the sight of the men whose opinions they most value.

Many men fancy that they are so important, so sufficient unto themselves that they can safely ignore the opinion of the whole world. But no talent, no genius, no inherited or acquired power justifies a man in following the dictates of his own sweet will.

Among the millions and millions of people in the world a man is little more than an atom. He is fortunate if he can make an impression on the world, if by doing something that is of service to his fellows he can be remembered a little while. But fame itself is only the world's estimate of a man, only the place he has made in the opinions of others.

It is easy for one to say that he would prefer to be right though the whole world was against him; but remember that when the whole world is against a man he is never right.

The weight of public opinion is always for good in the long run, as Lincoln so well knew and so well phrased in his proverb about fooling the people.

Let a man be guided by the opinions of the majority of his fellows; let him try to see himself as others see him, and appear in their eyes as he would have them appear in his, and he cannot go far wrong.

For the general public mind, happily prefers integrity to sham, loves courage and self reliance, and disapproves of everything that is dishonest, or secondarily, or purely selfish.

MOSES RECEIVING THE TEN COMMANDMENTS FROM THE LORD

BY RAPHAEL

THE VEN. W. M.
SINCLAIR,
ARCHDEACON
OF LONDON

AFTER 3,400 years modern progress and scientific advance have caused the dignitaries of the Church of England to consider the abridgment of so fundamental a thing as the Ten Commandments.

The reasons for this action, as given here by the Ven. William Macdonald Sinclair, the Archdeacon of London, will be read with interest by all Christians.

By the Ven. William Macdonald Sinclair, Archdeacon of London, Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral.

IT has been proposed by Dr. Furneaux, Dean of Winchester, to revise the Ten Commandments as they now appear in our Book of Common Prayer. The Commandments to be modified are the Second, Fourth and Tenth.

The Second Commandment now reads: "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of anything that is in Heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth; thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them; for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, and visit the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and show

The Woman Who Never Got Anything She Wanted.

Mrs. Yerkes' Life Is Well Symbolized by an Adaptation of Rudolph Henneberg's Noted Painting "The Pursuit of Fortune." Sad Fate of Beautiful but Unfortunate Mrs. Charles T. Yerkes, Who Died Broken-hearted at Forty.

Mrs. Yerkes' 10 Great Disappointments

- 1.—She could not win the leadership of Chicago society, though her husband had made himself master of its secret workings.
- 2.—Her social ambitions failed of realization in New York, in spite of her position of mistress of the splendid mansion her husband had built on Fifth Avenue.
- 3.—She dreamed of social conquests in England, but when Mr. Yerkes sailed to attack the steel transportation problem there she was left behind.
- 4.—Later she joined her husband in London, but why his success was social as well as financial, she was not received in the coveted set.
- 5.—Returning to the Fifth Avenue mansion, which her husband had filled with precious art objects, she again attacked the New York social circle and again was repulsed.
- 6.—When Mr. Yerkes died, worth at least fifteen million dollars, he will disappointed her ambition of becoming one of New York's richest widows, leaving her only two hundred thousand dollars and a mansion too expensive for her to keep up.
- 7.—The magnificent art gallery, which she had used her husband to create, became the property, not of herself, but of the City of New York.
- 8.—Disappointed in her second marriage to Wilson Mianer "for love," they lived together for one week, and soon she obtained a divorce.
- 9.—When she brought suit to break her husband's will, the Court decided against her.
- 10.—At forty years of age, still beautiful, she died broken-hearted—prayed to an unbroken series of disappointments.

She was stricken with the nervous disease from which she died, heart broken, tired of fighting the battle.

Strangely enough, the incident that followed the second Mrs. Yerkes never attacked Mr. Yerkes' private and ward, the beautiful Emily Grigsby. To her he gave the famous "House of Mystery" in Park Avenue. To her, who really left him a quarter of a million dollars, she was not ungrateful. In fact, she gave him a quarter of a million dollars, and he lived in the green of the handsome house and its contents, and with the income of the death bed gift, she is a popular factor in London society. Though the assistance of the well-known Knollys family she was introduced in the late King Edward and presented at court.

One of Mrs. Yerkes' Greatest Disappointments Was the Loss of This Famous Macmonnies Dancing Fountains Statue, Which Underwent Almost as Many Vicissitudes as She Did.

WITH the death of Mrs. Charles Tyson Yerkes, the curtain has rung down on one of the unappetizing domestic tragedies of the day.

With beauty of a sumptuous nature, wealth and high ambitions, this unhappy woman was for years the plaything of Fate. She never had anything she wanted. Everything she craved for was denied her. The golden prize just within her grasp always slipped away. With every door in life shut in her face, there was nothing left to live for. And so she died.

The tragedy of her life opened some twenty years ago, when, in marrying Charles T. Yerkes, she elected to be close to the man's darling, rather than a young man's slave. Yerkes had had a spectacular career in Philadelphia. Owing to some mischance he had been imprisoned for seven months in the Cherry Hill Penitentiary on a charge of embezzling. His first wife's devotion during that period was absolute. It was due to her efforts that the sentence was commuted. After his release he joined her and their two children, a son and a daughter. Then he divorced that faithful wife and married Mary Adelaide Moore, a daughter of the family member of the firm of Powers, Weightman & Moore, of Philadelphia.

When the young bride went to Chicago with her fifty-year-old husband she entered great things of life. With the golden key in her hand, she expected to unlock all doors. She aimed to be as great a factor in Chicago's social life as her husband was in the financial life.

Things proceeded well, Mr. Yerkes gave a great dinner and dance the week following his marriage. The splendid mansion he had bought on the Lake Shore Drive was ablaze with lights and gloriously radiant with flowers.

After a while all went well, and after Mr. Yerkes learned to know his Chicago, he realized that she had been "done." The most prominent social lights were not present and they never did recognize the bride.

Mr. Yerkes was still very much in love. When his beautiful wife begged for a New York mansion he waved his magic wand and, for one of the most splendid mansions in Fifth Avenue appeared.

The house was finished twelve years ago. It was the most superb residence in the whole of Fifth Avenue. People came from far and near to see it.

In her heart his mistress said, "Now is the appointed time," she suggested herself in all that grandeur, but society came not.

She went still further. She persuaded her devoted husband to found an art gallery. She planned to follow in the footsteps of J. Pierpont Morgan and Mrs. Jack Gardner, of Boston. But the art gallery failed. So the famous de Barry bed, for which Mr. Yerkes paid $25,000, the social doors of New York refused to unlock to her golden key.

to revolutionize the railroad system of London. A slight coolness was now existing between husband and wife.

The London papers were suddenly filled with tales of Mr. Yerkes' wonderful success in his railroad enterprises. Mrs. Yerkes, sitting alone in her art gallery, surrounded with masterpieces of statuary and painting for which an emperor might envy her, said to herself:

"I will go to London. There I will win out in this social game."

She joined Mr. Yerkes, who now lived in splendid style in a Grosvenor Square mansion.

Then again, with her case turned to dough, did this untiring Fate return to New York.

Her husband returned, he went to the Waldorf, was taken ill, and died in great agony. His wife, who had wanted to be the old man's darling, refused to visit him until a few hours before his death. Once again everything the widow had but one thought, the thought of freedom—freedom with unlimited wealth, for she knew the terms of her husband's will.

The will was read. The mansion with its contents for her lifetime, $200,000 in cash, and the income from one-half of the supposed $15,000,000.

It was sold at a price. The de Barry bed was knocked down to the highest bidder. Everything, in fact which the widow added with a secret and consuming passion, went under the auctioneer's bid. Leg by leg, death the courts gave her a share of the once untouchable estate made by Charles T. Yerkes in devious ways.

The ray of light penetrated the deep gloom. Less than a week after Westerner, Wilson Mianer, appeared in New York. He was a plumed local note in his home town. He met Mrs. Yerkes earlier in his career.

In less than a week the widow and the plumed were married secretly. The marriage was not announced for several weeks. And on the same evening Mrs. Yerkes Mianer announced that she would get a divorce. And she did.

Then she made a desperate effort to get more money out of her failed husband, and at last she acknowledged herself beaten.

Your Necktie Must Match Her Colors

WHATEVER color women decide shall be fashionable for their frocks becomes, automatically, the color for men's neckties. In the decision of men's suitors in London this Spring because most women will wear blue this season most men will wear blue ties. (Certainly many engaged men will copy their ladies' dress color scheme.)

If a man makes a point of matching his tie to his fiancée's frock it is probable that everything is going on as happily as the proverbial and prospective—marriage.

But color even at a distance does not apply to lovers. A man is generally first a judge of a woman's dress by the color of her eyes.

Last year, and the summer of a London with red dress was very popular and this season various shades of royal blue will be the most worn. Royal blue, in fact, is to be the sensation for color.

It is a man's marriage for a young man to bind his wife or fiancée with him by buying ties intentionally as comes to help him choose, and the result may always be that the ties he buys are of the same color as the dress she is wearing.

The man surely titillates matches what is shown him with what he wears. And it is not only in ties that men follow women's colors. The smartest dress of a man's socks to match his tie.

To put the subject to a practical test, an investigator took note of men's ties and women's frocks in several London art stores. Blue and black were being worn by the great majority of both sexes.

"Thou shalt not envy." Nothing beyond the proposition of the Dean of Winchester has developed and it is impossible to say

"Knockout" Brown's Romantic Tragedy

"K" LITTLE BROWN, the little lightweight pugilist, has to choose between a fortune of about $10,000 and the love of blue-eyed Annie O'Brien, his sweetheart. "Knockout" Brown's real name is Valentine Braun. He has come up the East side and is Irish. He is all German except his left hand, in which he carries his punch. This is Irish, because knockout says he inherited it from a left-handed grandmoother who came from County Clare.

All the East Side has been worked up over "Knockout's" romance. Now it is more worked up because it doesn't know whether it is a romance or a tragedy. Annie O'Brien loves "Knockout" Brown. All the East Side knows that. They've known ever so long that he loves Annie.

But Annie says she will never marry "Knockout" unless he gives up the prize ring right away.

This wouldn't be so bad, because "Knockout" has made $20,000 in the last two years by knocking people out in the ring. If it weren't for two things, one is that he has given all the $20,000 up to his mother. The second is that his next big match will be with Ad Wolf, the "Diamond Wild Cat" for the light weight championship of the world. This will mean a purse of at least a hundred thousand dollars for the winner and there doesn't seem to be any reason why "Knockout" shouldn't win it.

Miss Annie O'Brien, "Knockout" Brown's Sweetheart.

No to him the East Side and young Mr. Brown, Miss O'Brien's single, seems unreasonable. It was Lord Byron who said that "love is to man's life a thing as salt, and salt in other words is what Valentine has been trying to persuade his Annie.

"I ain't the same in the ring as I am out, Annie," he says. "I ain't the same in the ring as I am as a fellow. I ain't straight and clean."

"I ain't the same in the ring as I am out, Annie," he says. "I ain't the same in the ring as I am as a fellow. I ain't straight and clean."

"I ain't the same in the ring as I am out, Annie," he says. "I ain't the same in the ring as I am as a fellow. I ain't straight and clean."

settled. And now, on the very threshold of fame, with the light weight crown at his finger tip, the Cupid, with adoring face and a gasp, looks on, carefully scored in his right challenge. "Knockout" is not content with setting the count on him in the friendly match of "Knockout" from the ring entire. He is a challenge Valentine can't refuse, and he's bound to "lose" one way or the other.

Max, there ever given in his mother with boxing pride. It is the next egg of a hen, she is to build for herself and family, that is to be a shelter and a maintenance for their declining days. To give up boxing at this time would mean that he would have to make a new start, penniless.

How much of all this he has told Annie no one knows. She is a dark girl in one of the big department stores of New York. Scarcely an afternoon goes that Annie and Valentine do not meet. If she gets home first she sits in her doorway and waits until he comes. There are long talks and long talks and the good night kiss.

But as yet "Knockout" has not said that he will quit the fighting game.

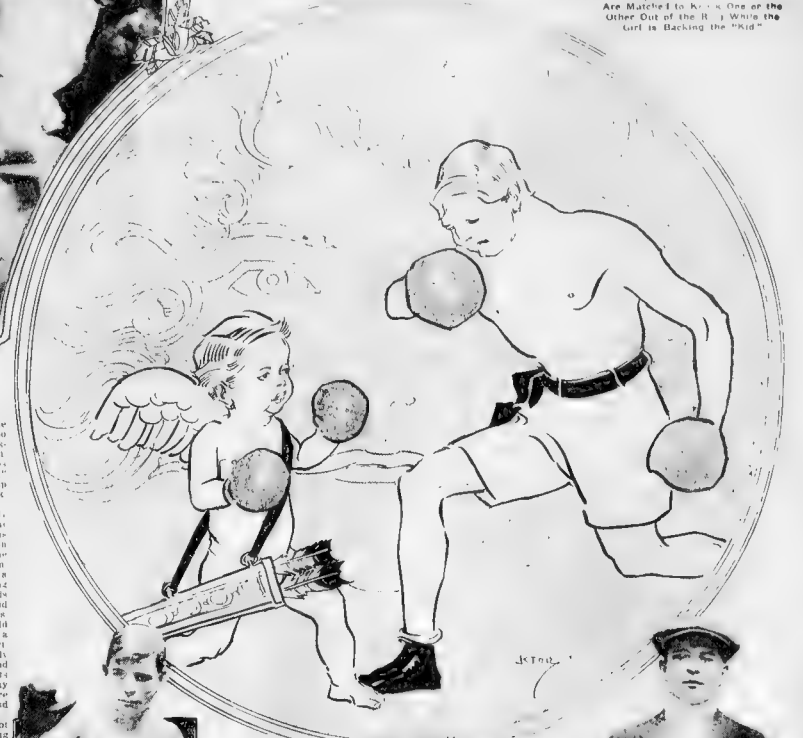

His Love and His Fortune Matched Against Each Other in the Ring, and One of Them Has to Take the Count

Why He Must Give Up the Ring
By Anne O'Brien

I CAN see the side of a prize fighter. A woman and I have been talking ever since we were in school. I have always been a steady fellow. Most of the Irish think him tough, but I can see more than that. He is a man who has a heart as big as his chest. He is a man who has a heart as big as his chest. He is a man who has a heart as big as his chest.

Why I Don't Think I Can
By "Knockout" Brown

THIS ring of boxing is a business more to me than most people think. I have to fight for my money. I have to fight for my money. I have to fight for my money. I have to fight for my money. I have to fight for my money.

A Sixty Thousand Dollar Pile of Old Scrap Iron

The Sixty-Thousand-Dollar Chesterfield Suit of Armour.

SIXTY thousand dollars seems like a lot of money to pay for a heap of scrap iron not weighing more than a hundred pounds. But when that scrap iron has enclosed the forms of noble, though unsavory, ancestors, and is covered with the armor of a tubular age of chivalry, saying it is not too much to pay for it.

Lord Chesterfield, a descendant of the Chesterfield who wrote such helpful letters to his son, owned the armor. He, needing money and knowing that the armor was a rather good suit belonging to one of his ancestors, decided to sell the old clothes. He took them to George K. Harding, a London dealer in antiques.

"It has been in the family for a long time," said Chesterfield, in effect, "up in my attic at Holme La, and I want two thousand pounds for it." That is ten thousand dollars in our money. Mr. Harding bought the armor.

Not long after that Lord Chesterfield heard that the antique dealer had received an offer of twelve thousand pounds for the armor. He was so pleased that he had sold it for so much more than he had asked for it that he decided to keep it. He kept it for a long time, and it was one of the only four complete suits of full armor in this country, one of which is at Windsor, one at the Tower of London, and one in the Wallace collection.

Lord Chesterfield was not a good lover. For the number of pounds he received for the old armor, he thought it would be a discredit to his ancestors not to keep money in the family. So he began selling against Harding. The route gave him back his armor and now an American has offered him $10,000 for it. It is said, this shows how the price of clothes can rise if they are only made of iron.

This will be the record price for armor if Lord Chesterfield gets the rumored $10,000. It means that England is not only losing her great paintings because she is over bid by America on them, but also her sacred reliquaries of the tourneys and all to buy new clothes for the modern descendants of these old knights.

This is "Knockout" as He Is in the Ring.

"Knockout" Brown's Odd Points

Doesn't smoke, chew, drink or gamble
Likes all ring men
Likes the days of Jim Blaine to fight
Likes his right hand and foot
Favorite Dishes—Ice cream and Irish stew, when made by his mother. This is her treat after all his big fights
If his mother is away, he gets a piece of a kitchen apron, washes the dishes and eats the stew
Gives all his money to his mother, and has made $20,000 in two years
Began to learn the trade of penitentiary, but left it because he was no trader for an athlete
Has never been knocked off his feet in a fight
And now has to choose between his sweetheart and the $100,000 lightweight championship.

What His Mother Thinks of Him

By MRS. BRAUN.
I have never loved anything so much as Annie, but it was a long time before I knew that there was anything serious between them. As to Valentine giving up fighting, I have nothing to say. He knows best. If it means his happiness with Annie I wouldn't advise him not to. But Valentine loves to fight.
"He gives me all the money he makes. Every time he has a fight he tells me what he makes and I have his share of the purse to me, and we now have over $10,000 in bank. Valentine doesn't seem to realize what money means. Even now, just as he did when a small boy, he will come to me for a quarter or a dime.
"I always knew he would be a success, but I never thought it would come through fighting.
"Valentine is a good, clean boy, and fights a clean fight. We'll soon have a home from what he has made. It's all up to him, but I would never stop him from fighting as long as he fought cleanly."

And This Is "Knockout" in His Sunday Suit Calling on Annie.

IF THE SAVIOUR CAME TO PARIS!

PARIS has been intensely interested in a really amazing book—"He Is Risen Again," by Charles Morice. This book describes the return of Jesus Christ to Paris at the present day. He preaches to the people. He talks to the reporters and scientists of Paris. He even goes into fashionable society to rebuke them for their hardness of heart.

His doctrines have not changed in two thousand years. He preaches a sermon on Mount Sion that is virtually a repetition of the Sermon on the Mount. He teaches that all a man needs is love and holiness.

Under the divine influence, absolute virtue and honesty become the rule. Business men will endure any loss rather than make a large profit. The Stock Exchange will no longer permit speculation. Women are respected and children protected. It is the reign of love and holiness.

But now the author proceeds to spoil his beautiful picture. He holds that our civilization is built up on an equilibrium of good and evil forces, and that to institute a rule of perfect love and unselfishness must destroy it. The incentive for gain being removed, business ceases. Speculation being stopped on the Stock Exchange, there is no longer any active market, and a terrible panic follows.

The President believes that the country is threatened with ruin, and on Christmas Eve instructs the Prefect of Police to request the Saviour to leave France.

This remarkable book, of which a review follows, is entitled, in French, "Il est ressuscité," and is published by Albert Messein, 19 Quai Saint-Michel, Paris.

Then, with much emotion, he gave Jesus a scientific history, directly and honestly of science. Science has already enabled us to fight the evil which we have placed in the world, and to render assistance to the poor. To this Jesus replied of this world. I have humanity of its life in the holier I have said.

ON the morning of December 11, Paris was opened their mouths and their eyes wide with astonishment. The main newspapers which printed news and toward advertisement, crowded with the names of the Saviour, were entirely blank.

It was a mystery to everybody. The advertisers could not explain it. The proprietors could not explain it. The news was so great that it was a link of the other nations was destroyed.

The proprietor of "The Dawn" offered a reward of one hundred thousand francs for the solution of the mystery and a princely portion for the discoverer.

The next day the newspapers appeared with the same blank pages.

After a day of vain investigation, the reporters of Paris gathered in the early morning hours at their favorite cafe—the Lupa (the most of the great central market).

As they chattered, the attention of one of them—Narda, the most thoughtful, because found upon a man seated alone at a table opposite him—fell to a place of red wine.

This man had, apparently, nothing to do with the subject, except that one could not base on him any particular criticism. Really, he was very handsome, but his beauty did not surprise one. If he had not been handsome, one could have been greatly surprised. His youth, formed of the perfect equilibrium of all the elements of his person, signified simply a man wonderfully average in every respect. His beauty came from the soul, however, infinitely serene, which radiated from his eyes, a radiant constant, rich, intense, which dimmed the brutal brilliancy of the electric chandeliers and showed itself in a blind hole about his long locks.

Narda was not dazzled by this radiance. He felt himself illuminated by it to the inner recesses of his soul. The luminous and calm look of the stranger refused the gaze of the journalist, and the latter could have sworn that, in looking at him thus, the unknown, without speaking, ordered him to be there on the morrow at the same hour, at the same place. Unconsciously Narda made the sign of assent.

The next morning all the newspapers appeared entirely blank, except for the title on matters it by whom the text is written?

"Begin, at least, to understand the meaning of the gospel. When you take your code in hand, ask yourself, 'What was the thought of the legislators?' With my gospel in hand, ask yourself 'What is the doctrine of the Saviour?' Do not stop at the letter, which kills; the spirit alone gives life. You might reproach me, if I had imposed on you positive proofs of the authenticity of the gospel. I should have reduced your reason to servitude and your worship would be that of a slave. I have left merit to your faith and excuse to your doubt."

"Lord, why is your law so hard?" asked the reporter.

"The law of the flesh is hard in another way than mine, and you know it well," said Jesus. "It is the law of the rich; so is the law of the strong. You speak words, and you hope that their sound may hide the emptiness of your soul. Do you know the secret of your own desires?"

"Lord, in all your gospel there is not once the word 'heart,'" said the reporter.

"And in all your laws," replied Jesus, "there is not once the word 'love.' Yet if the law be not founded on the love of men for one another, it is not really the law. Beauty is the sign of my presence. But this sign is evident and I have not made man blind. It is only the philanthropist and selfish, two vain tribes, who talk of love and beauty. I have not come for the esthetic and the philanthropist. Speak less of love, and now, increase it by love."

While he spoke to Narda, Jesus received at the Hotel of the Three Kings, which possesses three hundred rooms, three hundred reporters, each privately, at the same moment. It was the first of the new miracles. Each one of the reporters, proud of not being made to wait, believed himself specially favored, and, while explaining this privilege, by his own importance, was also disposed to see in it a proof of the divinity of his august interlocutor.

Three hundred interviews appeared in the evening and morning papers. They were very long, very interesting, and dealt with the questions of the day. The reporters had surpassed themselves, because they had all drawn unconsciously their own portraits idealized. Jesus always loved the men of this profession. Formerly, in Judea, He was their providence. Was it not to one of them that He explained why one should pay tribute to Caesar? He was pleased to appear to all the Parian reporters as a corrected and enlarged image of themselves.

The reporters had no difficulty in finding sympathetic expressions, moving metaphors to depict Jesus. Their enthusiasm being sincere, was contagious. People snatched at the papers, devoured these masterpieces in the street, regardless of the snow, by the light of gas and electricity.

The scientists flocked to see Jesus in a spirit of pure scientific research and zeal for accurate observation.

From the answers Jesus made to them, it was apparent that the Son of God was not aware of the astonishing progress achieved by the human mind in the course of the past century—in scientific theory, in actual knowledge of nature, in the marvelous, innumerable applications of scientific discoveries to hygiene, to therapeutics, to surgery—in fact, to the least as well as the most important functions of daily life. It was manifest that Jesus had not progressed since the days of Judas.

With respect to hygiene in particular, he adhered to the san donalously and dangerously alive convictions which he had expressed in the New Testament:

"Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man." (Matthew xv. 11.)

"Take no thought for your life, what you shall eat or what you shall drink, nor yet for your body, what you shall put on. Is not life more than meat, and the body than raiment?" (Matthew vi. 25.)

Jesus possessed no precise notion of the incomparable ideal of orthodoxy. Professor Metchnikoff thought he would bring Him down from His lofty position. He undertook to instruct Jesus, but He interrupted the scientist and said:

"You are a blind man, leading blind men. Now, if the blind lead the blind, shall they not both fall into the ditch?"

"The ditch will be disinfected, dear Lord," replied the director of the Pasteur Institute.

"Get a Receipt"

Every Successful Business Is Founded on the "Get a Receipt Plan"

Every business is founded on getting a receipt. When you deposit money in the bank the teller gives you a receipt. When the bank pays you money you give them a receipt. When you pay your insurance premium, your telephone, gas or electric light bill you get a receipt. When you buy goods at the department store and pay cash a duplicate receipt is either put in the package or handed to you.

All these large and successful concerns realized early in their history that the only way to get all their money and keep their customers satisfied was to give a receipt with every transaction.

The same principles which make a success in the above mentioned businesses apply directly to all businesses. Although the principles apply, many retail merchants have not as yet realized the fact. Some have not had the advantages of a proper business training; others hesitate to put into effect what they know is right because some of their brother merchants do not carry out business-like principles.

Easy to Give Receipt

In the past it has been difficult for a merchant to hand a receipt to every customer. During the rush of business it was too slow and cumbersome to write out and give each customer a receipt. With the National Cash Register "Get a Receipt Plan" the receipt is issued automatically when the record of the sale is made. No time is consumed in making it out. This receipt is the most efficient in the world. It surpasses the written receipt which is used by many large concerns. It is indelibly printed, can not be changed, and a duplicate record is left inside the Register under lock and key.

Benefits Everyone

This receipt benefits customers (and all people are customers), clerks and merchants. It benefits the customer by preventing disputes, overcharging and mistakes in change; stops mistakes in charge accounts, insures a proper record of money paid on account, gives information about special sales and new lines of goods handled by the merchant; protects children and servants by giving them a printed receipt to take home; shows which clerk waited on each customer, and in case goods are exchanged, proves the price paid and the date purchased.

It benefits the merchant, because it stops mistakes, stops losses, removes temptation, increases trade, increases profits, by enforcing a correct record of all cash sales, all credit sales, all money received on account and all money paid out. It wins the confidence of the public. It makes every sale advertise the merchant's business. It satisfies customers. It makes each clerk responsible for the way he serves all customers.

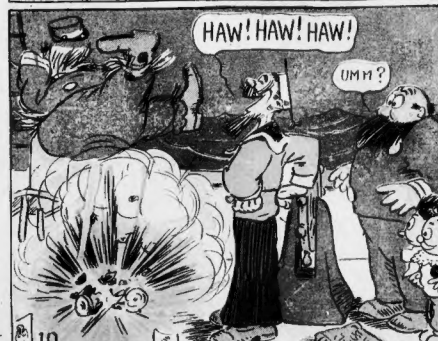

No large business could be conducted without giving a receipt for every transaction. If every merchant wishes to get every cent of profit out of his business, he should use the National Cash Register Receipt Plan.
